So when he was 19, he won the hand of dear little Christine, the most pious, elegant, and wealthy maiden of Zeegulle, the only daughter of the New Burgmaster.

His last words were: "One ought to recognize the limits of the possible."

Friday 24 April. 11.11 P.M.

A single drink of rum (on top ~~of~~ of a good deal of mental worry during the day) was enough to induce in J.O. an attack of acute mania.

Lying in bed, close cuddled, & nearly asleep, she suddenly started to scratch my face without the least warning, with a spate of the filthiest incoherent abuse of me & every body connected with me.

There had been a good deal of irritation & snappiness during the afternoon & evening, with one or two beginnings of the regular raving: but no one took any notice, & they subsided.

N.B. She had started to yell that morning, & then stopped.

This is a very difficult letter to write; but grave necessity compels me. This fact being evident from the contents, I trust that you will study them with the most serious attention.

Firstly - for this subject must always be first in my mind - as to your interest in occult ^{your attitude} ~~What you say~~ is perfectly ^{sound} true. At the same time, I believe that you would reap the greatest practical benefit, since a

The Brave Little Dutch Boy,

Little Hans Zwielmacher was the only son of the widow of the good old Burgomaster of Leeghutte.

When he was 12 years old, he was the cleanest and most obedient boy in the town. He always took the first prize in Sunday School, and he loved to skate in the winter with his little friend —

One day
